One of the finest methods to escape is to watch a movie, which is what many people do. There is something for everyone, whether it's unwinding from the pressures of everyday life, going on a date, learning how to manage stress, or spending a movie night with friends and family. In movies, there is something for everyone. In a study conducted in conjunction with the Department of Experimental Psychology at the University of Central Lancashire (UCL), Vue Entertainment and UCL found a link between viewing movies and improving mental acuity and cognition. A movie has the power to transport us to unfamiliar settings, inspire optimism, provide thrills, and even cause trauma. During the whole film, our attention is on the outcome for the main character. We fall in love with science fiction movies, superhero movies, drama movies, and animation movies because this character may take you on the journey of your greatest desires and experiences. With a few exceptions that will be covered further in the study, it can be concluded that consumers don't desire a lousy movie. Nonetheless, a talented filmmaker may push the boundaries and improve the viewing experience. Investigating the elements, we think are essential to receiving a "good" movie rating is the aim of this paper.

The Motion Pictures Dataset is a collection of meta-information about 45,000 movies that were released as recently as July 2017. The following information is included: cast, crew, plot keywords, budget, revenue, posters, release dates, language, production companies, nations, and TMDB vote counts and averages. The information also includes 26 million ratings from 270,000 people for each of the 45,000 movies. Ratings on a scale of 1 to 5 are provided. The file movies metadata.csv contains information on each film, including its name, budget, and earnings. The credits.csv file includes details on the cast and crew of each movie. Each movie's keywords are listed in the file keywords.csv. links.csv file contains information about the hyperlinks to other movie databases like IMDB and TMDb.

The file ratings.csv provides data on user evaluations of each film. Among the many applications of the dataset are trend analysis, sentiment analysis, and recommendation systems. However, processing and analyzing the dataset may necessitate significant computational resources due to its size. We investigated the event of interest, which is whether a movie is rated "good" or "poor," by analyzing the prediction of a good movie rating. In our study, movies having a budget, vote average, and runtime more than zero were taken into consideration. Also, we only picked movies that received a minimum of 50 votes. In an effort to derive findings and insights more efficiently from the model, we selected to focus on stars (actors), genres, the Top 15 Production firms, and directors as our categorical variables. Before we begin this part, it is crucial to remember that every variable in the model has a significant coefficient. In this part, we employed coefficients with both positive and negative values.

The sign of the coefficients can show if a variable has an influence on ratings even when they do not directly predict ratings.

Histogram of metadata$rating

Excellent and terrible standards created a feature-weighted rating that takes rating counts into account, and the results are based on the following standards: Movies that have a weighted rating of at least 3.5 and are better than 90% of other films are good movies. To find elements that could affect a movie's rating, we combined the rating information by movie ID and compute the average rating for each film. We considered a number of explanatory variables, including the budget, popularity, genre, top 15 productions, revenue, runtime, vote average, vote count, and release date, to evaluate if the movie is classified as "Excellent" based on these factors. We eliminated missing values and outliers, which can have an impact on the outcomes of any study of the data, after utilizing several techniques to clean up the data. It's usually a good idea to thoroughly consider why missing numbers and outliers occur before selecting how to handle them.

Then, we all put up a data frame and run a filter to limit the data to just include newly released films. The obtained data frame has 44657 observations in total. A psychologist from Oklahoma University investigated the relationship between various theater genres and research subjects' feelings. When watching various drama genres, the participants' emotions remained consistent. Our model demonstrates how certain genres might affect the selection and evaluation of a film. We start out by looking at the most common genre for each movie. It's interesting to notice that drama, comedy, and action may be more popular than other genres since people like longer films. The revenue most likely increased as a result.

By looking at the correlation matrix between each numerical variable in the metadata data frame and the rating, we were able to identify links between various factors in the data. The average vote, runtime, vote count, and popularity all appear to have favorable correlations with all the numerical variables in the metadata data frame and the Rating. Although there is a link between revenue and rating to some level, numerous data reveal that the income is zero. Top 15 production exhibits a better relationship with vote total, income, popularity, and budget than it does with rating. To find the factors that significantly affect a movie's rating and to draw out pertinent information from the data, the logistic model was utilized. It is now possible to define our recommendation function.

We utilize the following metrics to assess the model: Genre, Top 15 Production Companies, Popularity, Revenue, Runtime, Average Vote, Count of Votes, and Release Date. To forecast which model would work best, we added an actor and a director to the scenario. If the performers are good, the audience will be able to identify with the characters. The director is incredibly important in the process of producing movies because of the actor's performance, which is why some sequences from films from decades ago still have power today.

The findings from the final regression model we chose, which is utilized to comprehend the impacts of predictor variables on the quality of the film since this model performs an excellent job describing the same about all the dependents, are summarized here. We used ratings of 3.5 and higher as our predictive dataset for our independent variable since these films were regarded favorably by consumers. As can be seen, we identified the genre, Top15Production, duration, release month, and experienced director as factors that greatly contribute to the explanation of a good film.

The choice of these variables was made after a series of processes that entailed manipulating the raw data that was provided to us. The list of movies included a variety of genres, and some were divided into more than one category. To make things easier, we chose the most significant genre for each film. The frequency of each genre was then added together, yielding four values: Drama, Comedy, Action, and Others. Drama had the greatest frequency, followed by Comedy and Action, and the other genres were categorized under Others. We chose to simply use the top 15 production firms that occurred the most frequently in the list of data supplied, rather than utilizing the whole dataset for prediction. This was carried out to guarantee the objectivity of our findings. The runtimes of the data varied some of which were reported as 0. We only took into consideration movies with a duration of over 40 minutes to conduct a valid study. This is due to the fact that production firms need feature films to have a minimum length of 40 minutes. When introducing a new picture to the box office, production firms must take into account a number of important factors, including the month in which a film is launched. If a movie is released around a festival or over a holiday, its odds of doing well financially are substantially higher; in our data, this was a month.

We decided to narrow our attention to filmmakers who had made at least 30 films in their careers because analyzing the data with the number of different directors did not yield many insightful results. Then, we utilized this updated list of seasoned directors as a predictor in our research, which produced some noteworthy findings. Similarly, we believed that having experienced cast members would favorably affect the outcomes. The findings, however, were not as dramatic as we had anticipated after adding it to our model. So, we decided against utilizing this variable further.

The model shows that drama, comedy, thriller, romance, and action movies are more likely to be commercially successful than other genres. According to the model, these genres have been discovered to positively influence the prospect of a movie's success. A production firm might boost its chances of producing a successful film by concentrating on making films in these genres. Collaborate with a respected and well-known film company to raise the likelihood that a film will be a success. The model contends that a film's success may be influenced by the studio that produces it. A movie's chances of being a success can be increased by collaborating with a well-known and prestigious studio, which can provide the film with additional resources, marketing, and visibility. To improve the chances of a movie production succeeding, use experienced directors. The model revealed that a strong predictor of a movie's success was the director's experience. A production firm can boost its chances of creating a high-caliber film that connects with audiences by investing in talented directors. The model contends that a film's success may be influenced by its genre and the month of release. A production firm should carefully evaluate the release strategy for their films, including the genre in which it will be produced. It was also noted that films released around festivals or during the holidays were more likely to do well financially.

December is typically a holiday month, so releasing a movie during that time could increase its chances of success. However, it's important to note that the specific release strategy should be tailored to the particular movie and its target audience, as factors such as competition from other releases and the movie's genre can also influence the optimal release timing. Additionally, the model suggests that a movie's runtime can also be a significant predictor of its success. Therefore, production companies should ensure that their movies have a runtime of at least 40 minutes to be considered a feature film.

It is also crucial to remember that, although if the findings of the model were not significantly affected by include experienced cast members, it is still crucial to use great and qualified actors who can add depth and emotion to their parts. Finally, it's critical for production firms to keep collecting data about their films and analyzing it to make judgments about next projects. Production firms may improve their chances of making successful movies in the future by regularly studying and learning from their successes and mistakes. Ultimately, a production company may boost their odds of generating a successful movie by employing the results of this model. They can do this by making strategic decisions regarding the genre, studio, director, and release plan, and by using data-driven insights to guide those decisions.
